

Bell companies operate an "essential facility", and should have to accommodate other ISP firms that wish to purchase access from them. I believe that the public interest is best served by allowing the greatest number of competitors into the marketplace for delivering services such as DSL. The past history of the telecommunications industry suggests that service has always improved, and prices always declined only when the Bell companies (and their predecessor) have been required to provide access to competitors.